The relatively simple anatomy of the palm and fingers is well adapted to the tactile sense, and in particular the sense of touch along the fingertips. In the palm of the hand, the tactual nerve splits into several important branches. The digital nerves from the index, middle, and ring fingers are grouped and become the radial digital nerves, which each supply sensory innervation to the four most distal fingers and their distal interphalangeal joints. These branches merge to form the superficial branch of the radial nerve, which supplies sensory innervation to the skin of the thumb, the lateral two fingers, and a portion of the median and ulnar palmar surfaces. The superficial branch of the radial nerve becomes the palmar cutaneous branch of the median nerve as it descends palmarly along the palm to innervate the lateral half of the hand and the part of the palm lateral to the center of the M. abductor pollicis brevis insertion. The superficial branch of the radial nerve divides into a superficial branch and a deep branch. These are covered by the transverse carpal ligament; the superficial branch becomes the palmar cutaneous branch of the median nerve. The deep branch of the radial nerve divides further into deep radial and deep palmar branches. The deep radial nerve innervates the flexor pollicis longus, radialis profundus, and three muscles of the hand and wrist. The deep palmar branch innervates the palmar muscles of the hand and wrist. Damage to the central or peripheral nervous system may result in sensory loss or diminished sensory perception. The most common sensory loss in the hand and fingers is the loss of tactile perception, usually because of a loss of the sense of touch. The ability to sense the texture of objects is lost as the tactile nerves degenerate and die. As loss of sensation of touch occurs, the hand may become numb and function inadequately. Sensations lost by these types of damage may become a particularly uncomfortable to the patient.fyi -----Original
